QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether the Fourth Circuit erred in ruling that an anonymous, undated note, found in petitioner's home, is admissible as an adopted statement under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(B), in the absence of any evidence establishing that the petitioner acted upon the note -- a ruling that is in direct conflict with decisions by the Ninth, Tenth, and First Circuits.

2. Whether the Fourth Circuit erred in ruling that an otherwise inadmissible anonymous hearsay note is admissible as circumstantial evidence of an alleged conspiracy, where the note was admitted to prove the truth of the matter asserted therein, and no limiting instruction was given to the jury -- a ruling that is in direct conflict with the Tenth Circuit's decision in United States v. Jefferson, 925 F.2d 1242 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 884 (1991).

PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDING AND DESIGNATION OF CORPORATE RELATIONSHIP

Petitioner, Elizabeth Taylor Grady ("Mrs. Grady" or "Petitioner"), is an individual and, as such, has no corporate relationship. Mrs. Grady was a defendant in the underlying action in the United States District Court for the Middle District of North Carolina and defendant-appellant before the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

Two other defendants, Robert Allen Merritt and Thomas Elmore Harris, were also parties to the proceedings before the District Court and before the Fourth Circuit.

Respondent is the United States of America ("Respondent" or "the Government"). Respondent was the plaintiff in the underlying action before the United States District Court for the Middle District of North Carolina and the plaintiff-appellee before the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

Petitioner Elizabeth Grady respectfully petitions for a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

OPINIONS BELOW

There is no written opinion of the United States District Court. The portion of the trial transcript containing the district court's evidentiary ruling that is the subject of this petition for certiorari is included herein as Appendix A. The Fourth Circuit's unpublished, per curiam opinion is included herein as Appendix B and is available online at 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 7807.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was entered on April 22, 1998. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1) (1988).

STATUTORY PROVISION INVOLVED

Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(B) states:

Rule 801(d) Statements which are not hearsay. A statement is not hearsay if –

(2) The statement is offered against a party and is . . .

(B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth . . .

Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(b).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Fourth Circuit's decision in this case is in direct conflict with decisions by other Courts of Appeals regarding (i) the standard for the admissibility of adopted statements under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(B) and (ii) the proper standard for the admissibility of hearsay evidence for "circumstantial" purposes. In this case, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the admission of an unsigned, undated note purportedly addressed to petitioner, based solely on the note's having been found in Mrs. Grady's house -- a ruling that conflicts with the express requirement in the Ninth, Tenth, and First Circuits that the defendant have acted upon such a note or writing, i.e., that there be "possession plus." This note was a critical piece of the evidence upon which Mrs. Grady was convicted.

Mrs. Grady is a fifty-six year old grandmother in frail health. She had no prior crimminal record. She was convicted along with her son, who lived with her, and another co-defendant, of conspiracy to possess and possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute. Mrs. Grady worked for 19 years as a housekeeper in the home of Judith Dingfelder, who testified at trial on petitioner's behalf, and as a cook at the University of North Carolina.[1]

At trial, the government presented as evidence an undated, unsigned note, scrawled on the back of an envelope. An investigator with the Carrboro, North Carolina, Police Department, testified that he found the note during a search of the residence in which petitioner and her son resided. The note read as follows:

> Lit, I have paid Lucille rent and turned her heat on. I am going to the motel for one more night and get some rest by myself, so give me five rocks and $20.00 and we will . . . add it up tomorrow.

(App. 14a)

The note was found with a "large quantity" of other papers in a dresser drawer in a bedroom in petitioner's house.

1 Trial Transcript, 10/19/95, at 3-47 to 3-57, United States v. Grady, Merritt, Harris, Nos. 1:95CR213-1, 1:95CR213-2, 1:95CR213-3 ("Tr.").

(Tr. 10/18/95, at 2-45) The investigator testified that the papers found in the drawer with the note had the names of various people on them, including petitioner, her daughter Diane Robinson, Tracy Sheryl Robinson, Dorothy Farmer Wilson, William Scurlock, and others. (Tr.10/18/95, at 2-56, 2-58, 2-81, 2-82)

No evidence was presented to show that petitioner ever acted upon the note or even saw or read the note. No evidence was presented to show when the note was written or by whom. The writer of the note was not identified and did not testify.

Over the objections of petitioner's counsel, the district court ruled that the note was admissible because it was found in the "possession" of Mrs. Grady. The district court stated that "[i]t can be hearsay; but if it's in possession of your client, then that is not hearsay." (App. 9a) The district court did not specify the rule of evidence under which the note was admitted. Because the note was admitted for the truth of the matter asserted, the trial court did not instruct the jury to consider the note only for circumstantial or other limited purposes.[2]

During the trial, a "blow-up" copy of the note was displayed in front of the jury. (App. 1a) The Government, during its case in chief, presented the note to the jury as direct evidence of petitioner's guilt. The prosecutor stated to the jury during his closing argument in reference to the note: "And, finally, . . . on this letter put on the chart, addressed to 'Lit,' 'So give me five rocks,' you don't ask somebody to give you something unless they have it, ladies and gentlemen." (Tr. 10/19/95, 1-43).

2 In addition, the district court instructed the jury that if it determined that Mrs. Grady's possession of the note was an act in furtherance of the conspiracy, it could be considered as evidence against her co-defendants as well. (Tr. 10/18/95, at 2-73 to 2-75)

The petitioner was convicted under 21 U.S.C. §846 and §841 of conspiracy to possess and possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute. (App. 11a)

The Fourth Circuit affirmed petitioner's conviction in an unpublished, per curiam decision. The Fourth Circuit determined that the anonymous, undated note was admissible as an adoptive admission under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(B), stating, "'possession of a written statement becomes an adoption of its contents.'" (App. 13a (quoting United States v. Marino, 658 F.2d 1120, 1124 (6th Cir. 1981)). In so ruling, the Fourth Circuit did not address the undisputed fact that there was no evidence that Mrs. Grady had acted upon the note.

The Fourth Circuit alternatively ruled that the note was admissible, "not to prove the truth of the matter asserted, but to show the circumstantial relationship of the parties to the scene, the contraband or other parties." (App. 13a) The Fourth Circuit did not address the fact that the district court admitted the note for the truth of the matter asserted, without instructions limiting the jury's consideration of the note to circumstantial or background purposes. The Fourth Circuit also ignored the fact that the note was undated and had not been shown to have any temporal connection to the conspiracy charged.

Mrs. Grady is presently serving a term of imprisonment of 80 months. Since her incarceration, Mrs. Grady has suffered strokes and other serious health problems.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

This case presents two important issues under the Federal Rules of Evidence that are the subject of conflicting rulings in the Courts of Appeals. First, the Fourth Circuit's decision in this case directly conflicts with decisions of three other Courts of Appeals regarding the proper standard for the admission of a writing under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(B), which defines as non-hearsay "a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth." In the present case, the Fourth Circuit ruled that an unsigned, undated note addressed to petitioner was admissible as an adoptive statement, even though it was undisputed that there was no evidence that petitioner acted upon the note. (App. 2a - 4a; App. 14a) Contrary to the ruling of the Fourth Circuit in this case and the Sixth Circuit in United States v. Marino, 658 F.2d 1120, 1125 (6th Cir. 1981), the Ninth, Tenth and First Circuits have ruled that mere possession of a writing does not constitute an adoption of the statements contained therein. These courts have required a showing that the defendant in some way "acted upon" the writing in question or, in the words of the First Circuit, that there be "possession plus." See United States v. Carrillo, 16 F.3d 1046, 1048-49 (9th Cir. 1994); United States v. Ospina, 739 F.2d 448, 450 (9th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1126 (1985); United States v. Ordonez, 737 F.2d 793, 799-801 (9th Cir. 1983); United States v. Jefferson, 925 F.2d 1242, 1253 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 884 (1991); United States v. Paulino, 13 F.3d 20, 24 (1st Cir. 1994). This conflict between the Courts of Appeals as to the proper standard for determining the admissibility of a writing as an adopted statement implicates the fundamental purposes of the hearsay rules and merits resolution by this Court.

The Fourth Circuit also ruled as an alternative ground that the anonymous note was admissible as "background" or circumstantial evidence, despite the fact that the note was admitted by the district court for the truth of the matter asserted therein and was presented to the jury, without limiting instruction, as direct evidence of Mrs. Grady's guilt. This alternate ruling put forward by the Fourth Circuit for admission of the anonymous note raises important evidentiary issues that are the subject of conflicting rulings in the Courts of Appeals. In a ruling that is directly contrary to the Fourth Circuit's decision in this case, the Tenth Circuit has expressly refused to allow hearsay evidence of the kind admitted here to be changed into nonhearsay "simply by calling it 'circumstantial evidence.'" Jefferson, 925 F.2d at 1253 n.12 (citation omitted). As the Tenth Circuit held, where (as here) evidence is admitted for truth, "the fact that the evidence was introduced to link circumstantially the accused to the crime does not render the hearsay violation any more acceptable." Jefferson, 925 F.2d at 1253.

The admission at trial in the present case of the anonymous, undated note was not only improper under the Federal Rules of Evidence, but also violated Mrs. Grady's fundamental rights under the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Because the author of the note was not identified, petitioner was unable to cross-examine him or her at trial, as required by the Confrontation Clause. Therefore, the erroneous admission of the unsigned, undated note was reversible error, because it clearly was not harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. See Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805, 827 (1990).

Petitioner respectfully submits that this Court should grant certiorari to resolve the important conflicts among the Courts of Appeals as to (i) the proper standard for the admission of evidence as an adoptive statement under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(B) and (ii) the correct standard for the admission of otherwise inadmissible hearsay as "background" or "circumstantial" evidence.

I. THIS COURT SHOULD GRANT CERTIORARI TO RESOLVE THE CONFLICT IN THE COURTS OF APPEALS AS TO THE PROPER STANDARD FOR ADMISSION INTO EVIDENCE OF A WRITING AS AN ADOPTIVE STATEMENT

Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(B) removes a statement from the scope of the hearsay exclusion if the party against whom the statement is offered "has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth." In the instant case, the Fourth Circuit ruled that an undated, unsigned note was admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(B) as an adopted statement by the petitioner, even though there was no evidence that she acted upon the note, or indeed that she ever saw or read the note. This decision directly conflicts with decisions by the Ninth, Tenth, and First Circuits.

In contrast to the Fourth Circuit, the Ninth Circuit, in determining the admissibility of a writing as an adoptive statement, follows a long-standing rule that explicitly requires both that (i) the writing was in the possession of the defendant and that (ii) the defendant was shown by the evidence to have acted upon the information contained in the writing. See United States v. Carrillo, 16 F.3d 1046 (9th Cir. 1994); United States v. Ospina, 739 F.2d 448, 450 (9th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1126 (1985), United States v. Ordonez, 737 F.2d 793, 799-801 (9th Cir. 1983); Poy Coon Tom v. United States, 7 F.2d 109, 110-11 (9th Cir. 1925); see also Michael Graham, Handbook of Federal Evidence § 801.21, at 307-10 (4th ed. 1996) ("Mere possession of a document standing alone does not constitute a manifestation of adoption or belief in its truth.").

In Ordonez, 737 F.2d 793 (9th Cir. 1983), for example, the Ninth Circuit held that ledgers found in a residence leased by one of the defendants were inadmissible as adoptive statements. The Ninth Circuit in Ordonez rejected the "bold proposition" that "the possession of a document standing alone, is an adoption of its contents." Ordonez, 737 F.2d at 799-800. In the absence of any finding by the district court that the defendants had "manifested their adoption of the statements in the ledgers or that they had demonstrated their belief in their truth" and in the absence of "any evidence in th[e] record that would support such an inference," the Ninth Circuit ruled that the ledgers were not admissible as adoptive statements. Id. at 801.

In its decision in Ordonez, the Ninth Circuit looked to its earlier decision in Poy Coon Tom v. United States, stating:

> The law of this circuit concerning the admissibility of a document found in the possession of the defendant, for the truth of the matter asserted, is set forth in Poy Coon Tom v. United States, 7 F.2d 109 (9th Cir. 1925). In Poy Coon Tom, the Government offered an unsigned letter from a third person found in the defendant's possession which discussed a proposed narcotics transaction. The Government offered the letter "to show that the plaintiff in error was a known trafficker in narcotics, and that he had not only sold narcotics to the informer in question, but to others as well." We concluded in Poy Coon Tom that the admission of the letter was prejudicial error.

Ordonez, 737 F.2d at 800. The Ninth Circuit in Ordonez quoted the explanation in Poy Coon Tom for requiring a showing of action by the defendant upon the writing sought to admitted as an adoptive statement:

> We do not understand upon what principle the letter was admitted or was competent. It was manifestly not admissible as the unsworn declaration or statement of the unknown writer, and it was equally inadmissible for the purpose of showing an admission or an implied admission on the part of the plaintiff in error, in the absence of proof tending to show that the letter was answered or otherwise acted upon.
> "The fact that an unanswered letter or other paper is found in the custody of a party, but not acknowledged by him, is not ground for the admission of the paper as evidence against him. Were it admitted, an innocent man might by the artifice of others, be charged with a prima facie case of guilt, which he might find it difficult to repel."

Poy Coon Tom, 7 F.2d at 110 (citation omitted) (quoted in Ordonez, 737 F.2d at 800).

Indeed, in marked contrast to the Fourth Circuit in the present case, the Ninth Circuit has upheld the admission of anonymous writings as adoptive statements only where there is competent evidence that the writings were acted upon by the defendant. For example, in Ospina, the Ninth Circuit ruled that business cards containing handwritten notations and found on a dresser in the defendant's motel room could be introduced into evidence precisely because the defendant had been shown to have acted upon them. See Ospina, 739 F.2d at 451. One of the business cards bore the phone number of the hotel where the other defendants were staying. The other card contained the address of the location where the cocaine involved in Ospina had been transferred. See id. The Ninth Circuit found adoption because the cards "were in the possession of" the defendant and the defendant "acted on the information written on the cards when he travelled to the address written there to pick up the cocaine." Id.; see also Carrillo, 16 F.3d at 1049 (explaining Ospina).

Similarly, in Carrillo, the Ninth Circuit determined that a small folded white piece of paper with notations that was found in the pocket of one of the defendants was admissible because it had been acted upon. See id. at 1048. The paper, which was neither signed nor dated, contained three columns of numbers and letters. See Carrillo, 16 F.3d at 1048. The figures written on the paper coincided in both amounts and prices with the negotiations that were conducted by the defendant with a Government informant and recorded on videotape or audiotape. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the paper was admissible as an adoptive statement because "there was evidence of adoption that went beyond mere possession." Id. at 1049. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that because the "figures written on the paper coincided with [the defendant's] negotiations," there was "a sufficient link between the writing and [the defendant's] actions to permit the district court to find an adoption within the meaning of Ospina." Id.

The law of the Tenth Circuit is also directly contrary to the Fourth Circuit's decision in this case. In Jefferson, the Tenth Circuit explicitly rejected the rule that possession equals adoption that was articulated by the Sixth Circuit in United States v. Marino, 658 F.2d 1120, 1125 (6th Cir. 1981), and followed by the Fourth Circuit in the instant case. The Tenth Circuit explained:

> We are aware of the approach taken by the Sixth Circuit in United States v. Marino, 658 F.2d 1120, 1125 (6th Cir. 1981), where it held that an airline ticket used at trial to prove that "the defendants traveled in interstate commerce

> . . . was admissible because the defendants' possession of the documents constituted an adoption." The court stated: "Just as silence in the face of an accusation may constitute an admission to its truth, possession of a written statement becomes an adoption of its contents." We decline to apply the approach taken by the Sixth Circuit in Marino to this case. We can think of too many cases where the mere possession of a bill in no way constitutes an adoption of its contents.

Jefferson, 925 F.2d at 1253 n.13.

Furthermore, the First Circuit has required more than mere possession for a writing to be admissible as an adoptive statement. In United States v. Paulino, the First Circuit specifically followed the Ninth Circuit in determining that "the correct approach, exemplified by [the Ninth Circuit's decision in] Ospina, is that 'possession plus' can evidence adoption." Paulino, 13 F.3d at 24.

Under the rule that prevails in the Ninth, Tenth, and First Circuits, the anonymous note in this case clearly would not have been admissible as an adoptive statement. There was no evidence of any kind (as required by the Ninth, Tenth and First Circuits) that Mrs. Grady acted upon the note or otherwise manifested adoption of it. Indeed, there was no evidence that Mrs. Grady even read or saw the note, which was scribbled on the back of an envelope and stuffed in a drawer with numerous other papers bearing the names of various persons, including her daughter Diane and several other persons.

The Fourth Circuit's ruling that Mrs. Grady had adopted the note was based simply on the note's being addressed to Mrs. Grady and found in the drawer in her home. (App. 14a). While the Fourth Circuit also points to the contents of the note as "consistent with other evidence"[3] in the case, the Fourth Circuit does not (and cannot) point to any evidence in the record of any action taken upon the note by Mrs. Grady (or by anybody else) or of any actual connection between the contents of the note and the transactions with which the defendants were charged. The reality is that, under the Fourth Circuit's standard, most people would be deemed to have adopted many statements with which they do not agree. Under that standard, any time a note or letter addressed to a person was found in that person's home or otherwise held to be in that person's "possession," that person would be deemed bound by the contents of the note or letter, even where (as in the case of Mrs. Grady) no proof exists that the person ever read or saw -- much less acted upon -- the note or letter. Such "possession" of a note or letter simply does not indicate adoption of or belief in its contents. Cf. Leach & Co. v. Peirson, 275 U.S. 120, 128 (1927) (Holmes, J.) ("A man cannot make evidence for himself by writing a letter containing the statements that he wishes to prove. He does not make the letter evidence by sending it to the party against whom he wishes to prove the facts.").

3 As discussed below, the "consistency" that the Fourth Circuit finds with the other evidence in this case is specious. The note is not dated and nothing in the record indicates that it was written during the time of the conspiracy charged in this case. If the purported "consistency" between the note and the other evidence were a basis for admitting a writing as an adoptive statement, the writings in Poy Coon Tom and Ordonez would have been admitted. Indeed, in nearly every case, the writing sought to be introduced as an adoptive statement will be "consistent" with other evidence. In the present circumstances, the Fourth Circuit's ruling effectively removes not only the protections of the hearsay rule, but also the protections of Rule 404, prohibiting evidence of "other crimes" except for limited purposes.

The Fourth Circuit's standard falls far short of what is required by the terms of Rule 801(d)(2)(B) -- namely, that the defendant have manifested an adoption of the contents of the note or writing or a belief in its truth. The Fourth Circuit's decision leaves the truth-finding process open to all "the dangers traditionally recognized as inherent in hearsay, namely the lack of the normal safeguards of oath, confrontation and cross-examination of the credibility of the extrajudicial declarant." United States v. Watkins, 519 F.2d 294, 297 (D.C. Cir. 1975).

In sum, the Fourth Circuit's ruling that the unsigned, undated note at issue in this case was admissible as an adoptive statement is both erroneous and in direct conflict with decisions by the Ninth, Tenth, and First Circuits. This Court should grant certiorari to resolve the conflict among the circuits and to clarify the proper standard for admission of documents under Rule 801(d)(2)(B).

II. THE FOURTH CIRCUIT'S ALTERNATIVE GROUND FOR ADMISSION OF THE NOTE AS CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE WAS ERRONEOUS AND IS IN DIRECT CONFLICT WITH THE TENTH CIRCUIT'S DECISION IN UNITED STATES V. JEFFERSON

The Fourth Circuit also ruled that the anonymous, undated note was admissible "not to prove the truth of the matter asserted, but 'to show the circumstantial relationship of the parties to the scene, the contraband or other parties.'" (App. 13a (quoting United States v. Marino, 658 F.2d 1120, 1124 (6th Cir. 1981)). That ruling is erroneous because the note was admitted into evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted, not as "background" evidence, and was presented to the jury as direct evidence of Mrs. Grady's alleged participation in the conspiracy charged. Moreover, the note was admitted by the district court without restriction or instructions to the jury limiting the purposes for which the note might be considered. The Fourth Circuit's ruling that the note, which was clearly inadmissible hearsay, was admissible as circumstantial evidence directly conflicts with the Tenth Circuit's decision in Jefferson, 925 F.2d at 1252-54.

In Jefferson, the Tenth Circuit made clear that hearsay evidence may not be transformed into nonhearsay "simply by calling it 'circumstantial evidence.'" Jefferson, 925 F.2d at 1253 n.12 (citation omitted). In that case, the court held that a pager bill was inadmissible hearsay. In addition to finding that the pager bill was not an adoptive statement, the Tenth Circuit flatly rejected as "without merit" the Government's argument that the trial court's admission of the pager bill did not violate Federal Rule of Evidence 801 because the pager bill was "offered as circumstantial evidence to show . . . the character and involvement of the Defendant." Id. at 1252. The Tenth Circuit emphasized that > [w]hether evidence is offered as circumstantial evidence as opposed to direct evidence has nothing to do with whether it constitutes inadmissible hearsay. Granted the pager bill combined with agent Young's testimony regarding the use of pagers by drug dealers was introduced as circumstantial evidence of [the defendant's] intent to possess and distribute the cocaine. However, the fact that the evidence was introduced to link circumstantially the accused to the crime does not render the hearsay violation any more acceptable. . . . The protection afforded to an accused by Rule 801 should not be discarded simply because the evidence is to be used circumstantially.

Id. at 1252-53.[4] In reaching this conclusion, the Tenth Circuit specifically noted that the hearsay evidence at issue in Jefferson (just like the hearsay note at issue in this case) had been admitted at trial to prove the truth of the matters asserted. Id. at 1253. Thus, the Tenth Circuit's decision in Jefferson would not permit the admission into evidence of the anonymous note at issue in the instant case as circumstantial evidence, and the alternative ground posited by the Fourth Circuit for the admission of the note is in direct conflict with the law of the Tenth Circuit.[5]

Commentators agree that the Tenth Circuit's position is correct. As one leading commentator has explained, permitting the use of otherwise inadmissible hearsay evidence under the rubric of "circumstantial" evidence improperly bypasses the 4 Cf. United States v. Williams, 133 F.3d 1048, 1051 (7th Cir. 1998) (inadmissible hearsay could not be justified on appeal as not offered for truth but as circumstantial evidence "to establish the course of the police investigation"); United States v. Watkins, 519 F.2d 294, 296 (D.C. Cir. 1975) (rejecting Government's contention on appeal that hearsay evidence had been offered as circumstantial evidence, where record, including prosecution's opening statement to jury, made clear that receipt was admitted for truth of matter asserted).

5 The Tenth Circuit's ruling in Jefferson does not result in undue interference with the Government's ability to prosecute a case. For example, in United States v. McIntyre, 997 F.2d 687 (10th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 510 U.S. 1063 (1994), certain notes and receipts were ruled inadmissible hearsay and not admitted for the truth of the matter asserted therein. Nonetheless, in order to link the defendants together in a common scheme and to connect them to certain locations, the Government was allowed to put on testimony as to where the papers were found and as to the fact that the papers bore certain names and addresses on them. See McIntyre, 997 F.2d at 702.

protections provided to the truth-finding process by the hearsay rules:

> All hearsay evidence could be viewed as a kind of circumstantial evidence, and all hearsay risks could in that view be transmogrified into mere questions of weight. That course of reasoning, however . . . leads inevitably to error because it bypasses the whole point of the hearsay rule: when the belief of a human being in a matter is used as evidence of a matter, special risks exist, and special safeguards, especially cross-examination, have been designed to deal with them.

Olin Guy Wellborn, The Definition of Hearsay in the Federal Rules of Evidence, 61 Tex. L. Rev. 49, 62-63 (1982); see also R. Park, McCormick on Evidence and the Concept of Hearsay: A Critical Analysis Followed by Suggestions to Law Teachers, 65 Minn. L. Rev. 423, 431 (1981) (noting with disapproval that some "courts have change[d] hearsay into nonhearsay simply by calling it 'circumstantial evidence'"). This Court should not countenance the significant erosion of the hearsay rules that will result if the Fourth Circuit's decision is allowed to stand.

Furthermore, the Fourth Circuit's ruling that the anonymous note at issue in this case was admissible as circumstantial evidence contravenes the practice of other circuits in other important ways. None of the "links" that "circumstantial" evidence is generally used to demonstrate is present here. See United States v. Marino, 658 F.2d 1120, 1124 (6th Cir. 1981) (admitting evidence not for the truth of the matter asserted, but "to show the circumstantial relationship of the parties to the scene, the contraband or other parties"). The note does not refer to Mrs. Grady's co-defendants and does not link her to them. The note does not link Mrs. Grady to the actual contraband that was the subject of the transactions charged. Moreover, while the note does link Mrs. Grady to a particular location, that location is her own home -- a fact that was never in dispute. In addition, nothing ties the anonymous note to the time of the alleged conspiracy. Cf. United States v. Lamon, 930 F.2d 1183, 1192 (7th Cir. 1991) (reversing conviction where undated notes "would allow the jury to do no more than speculate that the entries represented transactions during the period of the charged conspiracy"). There is nothing in the contents of the note that indicates when it was written, and the place where it was found -- in a drawer containing papers of various dates -- does not indicate whether the note was written days, months or years before it was found. Nor were the transactions in the conspiracy charged in this case in any way similar to the circumstances apparently indicated by the note. In sum, the note in this case has no "background" significance to the conspiracy charged.

The erroneous admission of the anonymous, undated note violated Mrs. Grady's fundamental right under the Confrontation Clause to cross-examine the witnesses against her. See Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 404 (1965) (right of confrontation is "[o]ne of the fundamental guarantees of life and liberty" and "a right long deemed so essential for the due protection of life and liberty that it is guarded against legislative and judicial action by provisions in the Constitution") (quoting Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 55, 56 (1899)). The writer of the note was not identified and did not testify at trial. Where, as here, the admission of hearsay evidence violates the Confrontation Clause, a heightened standard for determining harmless error applies. Under that heightened standard, reversal is mandated where, as here, it is clear that the erroneously admitted evidence was not harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. See Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805, 827 (1990).

CONCLUSION

The Court should grant certiorari to resolve the conflicts among the Courts of Appeals as to (i) the correct standard for the admission of a writing as an adoptive statement under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(B) and (ii) the correct standard for the admission of otherwise improper hearsay evidence as "background" or "circumstantial" evidence.

APPENDIX A - EXCERPT OF TRIAL TRANSCRIPT OF OCTOBER 18, 1995 UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE MIDDLE DISTRICT OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. Mangum: Yes, Your Honor. Mr. Hamilton has brought a big blow-up in here today. It may benefit us to [2-16] take it up before the jury comes back.

The Court: All right.

Mr. Mangum: I think it is intended for today.

The Court: Yes, sir.

Mr. Mangum: I brought it up once earlier. It is something that was seized in the house. It's an envelope that somebody has written on, "Lit, I have paid Lucille rent and turned her heat on. I am going to the motel for one more night to get some rest by myself, so give me five rocks and $20.00 and we will add it up tomorrow."

The Court: Where was that found, in the house?

Mr. Hamilton: Your Honor, one other thing I might add, Your Honor, Mr. Mangum read it in its entirety. But in the margin there's also a word, O-S-H-E, Oshe, which we believe is the name that we may be able to connect a little bit later.

Mr. Mangum: It's a child, Your Honor.

Mr. Hamilton: It's a child who lives in the residence or stays in the residence sometimes.

The Court: And where was that found? You may have a seat now, Mr. Mangum.

Mr. Mangum: Thank you, Your Honor.

Mr. Hamilton: Your Honor, we will produce testimony of the Carrboro agent who found this while executing the state search warrant at 110 Eugene Street, which is the residence [2-17] that has been called during the trial. And we will produce evidence that Ms. Grady and Mr. Harris were arrested at 110 Eugene Street. And I don't think it is contested, in any event, that they resided there.

The Court: Were they arrested at the time this was found?

Mr. Hamilton: The same day, I believe. But I could ask Mr. Dolan, to make sure. Executed at the time of arrest.

The Court: All right.

Mr. Hamilton: Of course, we think it's probative because of the reference to rocks, Your Honor. It's also address [SIC] to "Lit," and we produced testimony from Mr. McDowell that Elizabeth Grady has the nicknames of "Litty" and "Lit."

The Court: Now, Mr. Mangum, is your objection based upon the substance of the note, or is it the blow-up that you're concerned about?

Mr. Mangum: The substance of the note.

The Court: You have no objection to the blow-up, if the note itself is admissible? You have no grounds to say you can't blow it up and show it to the jury, do you?

Mr. Mangum: Not particularly.

The Court: So we will wait and see what the government can prove in that respect. Until that time, it will remain turned around.

Mr. Mangum: Well, I don't know how the Court wants [2-18] to proceed, but I was willing to stipulate that she was there when she was arrested. It was her house.

The Court: Well—

Mr. Mangum: And my objections are pretty straightforward.

The Court: What is your objection based upon now?

Mr. Mangum: The rules of evidence, Your Honor.

The Court: What?

Mr. Mangum: Rule 401, relevance; 403, undue prejudice.

The Court: Well, wouldn't it be relevant that a note was found in the place where she lives and where she is, saying, "Give me five rocks"?

Mr. Mangum: No, sir.

The Court: That's not relevant?

Mr. Mangum: It's not dated. It's not signed. We don't know who wrote it. We don't know whether she ever knew about it. We don't know whether it was ever communicated to her. You can see that the spelling is bad and the handwriting is bad.

The Court: Well, let me see if - you may disagree with this analogy - but suppose the evidence is that during these times that we were calling them on the telephone, we had an observation of the house at the same time and there were people coming and going at all hours, staying for a few [2-19] minutes and leaving, coming – other people were coming and knocking on the door, being met at the door. People were then leaving the house. Wouldn't that be some evidence that the jury could find that, in fact, something is going on that supports the government's theory of conspiracy and activity in the house?

Mr. Mangum: Well, Your Honor, that kind of testimony is always enjoined with some sort of investigative expert testimony to characterize what it means. In addition, it's also cabined within the time framework of the indictment. In this case, it's obvious under 801 that this is hearsay. It's also obvious why the government intends to offer it. They say that it's probative to prove, because it has the word "rock" in it.

The Court: Yes.

Mr. Mangum: Obviously, they hope and intend for the jury to believe that she had rocks to give the writer of the note.

The Court: Right.

Mr. Mangum: That is the most outrageous form of hearsay that you could possibly have, an unknown writer at an unknown time makes a statement that the jury is supposed to believe about my client. I can see constitutional confrontation issues abounding there. How do we cross examine whoever wrote this?

[2-20]

The Court: What if they took it off the person of your client? Would that make any difference?

Mr. Mangum: Well, I would think that that is one of the reasons why I said it's such an outrageous form of hearsay is that they would have to show that she knew – not only that she knew about the letter, which they can't show, but that she didn't contest the contents of what the writer on the note had to say.

The Court: Well, what if they found it on her person when they arrested her, searched her, and found that note on her person? Could the government introduce it then?

Mr. Mangum: I would still have two or three objections, Your Honor.

The Court: The same one?

Mr. Mangum: Well, yeah. But in addition, it's 404(b), other acts evidence. We don't know that it's in the framework of the indictment.

The Court: It may not be, but it's during the time of the indictment. And it seems to me that if it's during the time of the indictment, if it's competent evidence for other reasons, it's competent to consider as against her during the time.

Mr. Mangum: Not insofar as it's hearsay.

The Court: But the hearsay is not a problem if it's in her possession, is it?

[2-21]

Mr. Mangum: Well, I think it is.

The Court: Well, why is it hearsay if it's in her possession? For instance, as an example, the officers are watching the place, and they hear somebody say — This didn't happen, but I'm just giving you an example. They heard somebody shout out, "Litty, do you have some rocks of cocaine for me?" And they heard her answer, "Yes, I do. Come on in and get it." They go in and get it. Now that's hearsay from that person that shouted, because they don't know it was. They just heard a shout in the night, and somebody go up there. That's hearsay. But it's competent, because she is expressing a position on that.

Mr. Mangum: Well, I think you are talking about an exception to the hearsay rule.

The Court: All right. Well, doesn't her possession of the note constitute that same exception?

Mr. Mangum: No.

The Court: Why?

Mr. Mangum: If I wrote you a letter and said please stop beating your wife—

The Court: Yes.

Mr. Mangum: --and you possessed it, that certainly does not mean that you beat your wife.

The Court: Exactly.

Mr. Mangum: Especially if it is an anonymous note.

[2-22]

The Court: But it may be some evidence. If my wife wrote that note or somebody wrote a note and said, "Please stop beating me."

Mr. Mangum: Right.

The Court: And I'm charged with beating my wife, and I have that note, it seems to me that is some evidence. It may be that it's not conclusive, but it's some evidence.

Mr. Mangum: Well, I understand that you can – you can sniff this evidence and think it smells a little bit against my client.

The Court: Right.

Mr. Mangum: But if you analyze the hearsay rules, it's obviously hearsay, because I can just read you the 801, and it's obviously what it says.

The Court: Well, it's obvious that no one knows who wrote that. Everybody would agree to that.

Mr. Mangum: One of the exceptions for what is hearsay is that it is an admission by a party opponent, i.e., my client. To make it an admission, it tells A, B, C, D, E how it can be an admission, and it isn't any one of A, B, C, D, E.

The Court: Okay.

Mr. Mangum: If I could just go through them very briefly. "A party's own statement." No, it's not. "Statement to which the party has manifested an adoption or [2-23] belief in its truth." No, it's not.

The Court: I'm not so sure about that, but go ahead.

Mr. Mangum: Okay. My position is they got no evidence of that, Your Honor.

The Court: Okay.

Mr. Mangum: C, "A statement by a person authorized by the party." We don't know who made the statement. D, "A statement by the party's agent or servant." Certainly, we don't know who that is, especially within the scope of their agency. Or, E, "A statement by a conspirator of a party during the course of and in furtherance of the conspiracy." We don't know who said it. We certainly don't know whether he said it or he said it.

The Court: Or someone else who is a member of the conspiracy, if there is anybody.

Mr. Mangum: Well, we certainly have an ill-defined conspiracy, if it extends beyond the people at this table.

The Court: All right. I understand what you are saying, Mr. Mangum. I am going to not rule on that at this point. However, I will tell you at this point that from what I have heard so far that I believe it turns out – and already there's evidence that she had this house, and that it was found in the house at the time of the arrest – it may be admissible. We will take that when we get to it. I'm just [2-24] telling you the way I lean at this point from hearing what I've heard so far. We will take it up again. I will give you an opportunity.

Mr. Mangum: May I do that now?

The Court: You can do it during break. What I was—Is that going to be some reason to contest the admissibility of the 24 and 25-A and B?

Mr. Mangum: Well, to get to the bottom line on the envelope –

The Court: Yes, sir.

Mr. Mangum: -- as I say, again, my fundamental point is that it is hearsay. If you believe that it is not hearsay, that it is somehow an exception to the hearsay rule, and it's relevant, then my point is that they have not shown that this is my client's said papers.

The Court: All right. I think that is what the contest is, and you may be able to show that it's not. But I think the government has an opportunity to show that there are things there that would indicate that this is your client's property. But she certainly is in charge of the property. That has never been contested. She is the one who has the property, and they're showing at least that there are female clothes in that room and that the envelopes in the same drawer were at least addressed in part to your client.

Now you may contest that, but I do not believe that it makes it inadmissible as hearsay. This is material that the government is saying is in possession of your client, and you disagree with that, but that is what the jury is for, to determine whether that was possessed by your client.

Mr. Mangum: Your Honor, I guess I have to make the point that even if it is admissible as non-hearsay or an exception to the hearsay rule, that there's still the question of 403.

The Court: The prejudicial effect?

Mr. Mangum: Absolutely.

The Court: Well, if it is admissible and it shows that somebody said something to your client about rocks, that your client had something in her possession about rocks, that certainly is incriminating. What makes it more prejudicial than incriminating, if it is admissible?

Mr. Mangum: Three things in general. Number one what is the character or the nature of incrimination that we're talking about. We're talking about someone said something to her about rocks. This indicates fairly on its face that someone, but we do not know who, at a time we do not know when, for a reason we do not know why, wrote something addressed to a person with my client's name indicating that they believed she would give them rocks.

The Court: Oh, I think if there was material there [2-62] that showed how to cook cocaine into crack, that that type of material is purely hearsay because it's from another person. But we're not talking about hearsay. It can be hearsay; but if it's in possession of your client, then that is not hearsay. Your driver's license issued is hearsay, but it's in your possession. It has your name on it, and that doesn't make it inadmissible. And that's what we're talking about here. Certainly nobody can say that X issued your driver's license, but it's in your possession. And that's the theory that I think you are going on differently from what the government is here. It's not a matter to me of whether the document is hearsay or not. It's a question of whether it is admissible, since it was perhaps at least arguably in your client's possession.

Plaintiff-appellee,

ROBERT ALLEN MERRITT,

ELIZABETH TAYLOR GRADY,

THOMAS ELMORE HARRIS, JR.,

Defendants-Appellants

Appeals from the United States District Court for the Middle District of North Carolina, at Durham.

William L. Osteen Sr., District Judge. (CR-95-213).

Argued: January 30, 1998

Decided, April 22, 1998

Before RUSSELL[1] and WILKINS, Circuit Judges, and TRAXLER, United States District Judge for the District of South Carolina, sitting by designation.

COUNSEL

PER CURIAM:

In this consolidated appeal, Robert Allen Merritt ("Merritt"), Elizabeth Taylor Grady ("Grady") and Thomas Elmore Harris ("Harris"), collectively "defendants," appeal their convictions for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute crack cocaine base, see 21 U.S.C.A. § 846 (West Supp. 1997) and possession of crack cocaine base, see 21 U.S.C.A. § 841(a)(1) (West 1981). We affirm.

I.

Merritt, Grady, and Harris were convicted of operating a crack distribution group and crack house in Carrboro, North Carolina, near the University of North Carolina's Chapel Hill campus. In early 1994, Carrboro police officers apprehended University of North Carolina student Dennis McDowell (the "informant") in possession of crack cocaine, who later agreed to assist police and the Drug Enforcement Administration by acting as an informant in drug investigations. At the time, the informant had known Grady, Merritt and Harris for approximately nine months. At the request of police, the informant called Grady's residence on numerous occasions to arrange purchases of crack cocaine and its delivery to parking lots near Grady's residence. The deliveries were made by Merritt, Harris, or a third "runner," Eddie Atwater ("Atwater"). The telephone calls and deliveries were recorded, and the deliveries were witnessed by law enforcement officers. A joint indictment was returned in August 1995 against Grady, Merritt, Harris and Atwater, alleging a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute crack cocaine, as well as possession of crack cocaine.[2]

[2] All defendants were convicted of Count 1 of the indictment, for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine base. The remainder of the counts were for possession with intent to distribute cocaine base. Grady was convicted of Count 2, Merritt was convicted of Counts 2 through 5, and Harris was convicted of Counts 4 and 5. At the time of trial, Atwater was awaiting separate trial for his alleged participation in the conspiracy.

II.

We first address two issues raised by all defendants concerning the district court's admission of evidence at trial. We affirm as to each.[3]

Defendants first contend that the district court erred in admitting into evidence an anonymous note that had been seized during the execution of a search warrant at defendant Grady's residence. Defendants contend the note was hearsay under Fed. R. Evid. 801(c), and that it should have been excluded under Fed. R. Evid. 403. We review the district court's rulings for an abuse of discretion. See United States v. Whittington, 26 F.3d 456, 465 (4th Cir. 1994).

Documents found in a defendant's possession may be admitted, not to prove the truth of the matter asserted, but "to show the circumstantial relationship of the parties to the scene, the contraband or other parties." United States v. Marino, 658 F.2d 1120, 1124 (6th Cir. 1981). Furthermore, a document found in a defendant's possession may be admissible as an "adoptive admission" under Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(B). "Just as silence in the face of an accusation may constitute an admission to its truth, possession of a written statement becomes an adoption of its contents." Marino, 658 F.2d at [3] Defendants also collectively challenge 21 U.S.C. § 841 and § 2D1.1 of the United States Sentencing Guidelines, which impose a 100 to 1 ratio in the penalties for cocaine and cocaine base. Contending that the provisions contain an ambiguity in the application of the penalties, defendants argue that the rule of lenity requires a sentencing court to impose the lesser penalty. Defendants, however, concede that this issue was decided adversely to their position in United States v. Fisher, 58 F.3d 96, 98-99 (4th Cir. 1995). Accordingly, we find no merit to this exception.

1125. "[S]o long as the surrounding circumstances tie the possessor and the document together in some meaningful way, the possessor may be found to have adopted the writing and embraced its contents." United States v. Paulino, 13 F.3d 20, 24 (1st Cir. 1994). Such adoptive admissions are not hearsay and are properly admitted into evidence. See e.g., id. at 22-25 (customer receipt for a Postal Service money order found in apartment used as a drug distribution outlet was admissible as an adoptive admission); United States v. Ospina, 739 F.2d 448, 451 (9th Cir. 1984) (business cards with handwritten notes and motel receipt found in defendant's hotel room were admissible as adoptive admissions). Here, the anonymous note was addressed to "Lit," Grady's nickname. It was found in a dresser drawer in a bedroom containing a woman's clothing, along with other documents bearing Grady's name, including a county tax receipt. The author of the note, albeit unknown, was clearly desirous of obtaining "rock" cocaine.[4] We are satisfied that the content of the note and its location sufficiently tie the document to Grady and her co-conspirators, and is consistent with other evidence that defendants were operating a crack distribution business from Grady's residence. Accordingly, the district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the note as evidence.

Defendants also contend that the district court should have excluded the note under Fed. R. Evid. 403, asserting that its probative value was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. We disagree. The note, addressed to Grady and obviously evidencing drug activity, was admitted as additional evidence of Grady's knowledge of and participation in the drug conspiracy and to corroborate the taped drug negotiations between defendants and the informant. Accordingly, the district court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the note's probative value outweighed its prejudicial effect and in admitting it into evidence.

[4] The note was written on an envelope and read as follows: "Lit, I have paid Lucille rent and turned her heat on. I am going to the motel for one more night and get some rest by myself, so give me five rocks and $20.00 and we will ... add it up tomorrow." J.A. 430.

B.

Defendants next contend that the district court erred in admitting tape recordings of telephone conversations between the informant and defendants to set up controlled crack purchases, alleging the government failed to properly authenticate the tapes. Decisions of the district court to admit tape recordings into evidence are reviewed for an abuse of discretion, and we will not find error unless the foundation for admission is "clearly insufficient to insure the accuracy of the recording." United States v. Branch, 970 F.2d 1368, 1372 (4th Cir. 1992) (internal quotation marks omitted). In determining the admissibility of a recording, courts are guided by seven factors outlined in United States v. McKeever, 169 F. Supp. 426 (S.D.N.Y. 1958), rev'd on other grounds, 271 F.2d 669 (2d Cir. 1959).[5] Defendants argue that in order to authenticate the

---

[5] The specific factors are:

(1) That the recording device was capable of taking the conversation now offered in evidence.

(2) That the operator of the device was competent to operate the device.

(3) That the recording is authentic and correct.

(4) That changes, additions or deletions have not been made in the recording.

(5) That the recording has been preserved in a manner that is shown to the court.

(6) That the speakers are identified.

(7) That the conversation elicited was made voluntarily and in good faith, without any kind of inducement.

recordings the government was also required to show that the informant listened to the tapes immediately after the recording and again immediately prior to his testimony at trial. This court has never embraced this position; rather, recordings are admissible so long as the testimony is "sufficient to support a finding by the jury that the tapes [are] what the Government claimed." Branch, 970 F.2d at 1372. Here the government established how the calls and recordings were made, and demonstrated a chain of custody for each. Additionally, the government played the tapes for the informant on the morning of trial and confirmed that the tapes accurately reflected the conversations that had occurred. Accordingly, we conclude the district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the tapes as evidence.

III.

Defendant Grady has independently raised several additional exceptions to her convictions and sentence. We address and reject each in turn.

A.

Grady was convicted of conspiracy to possess and distribute crack cocaine from August 1994 to August 1995, and of possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine on December 8, 1994. She contends the evidence produced at trial was insufficient to support her convictions. We disagree. The evidence revealed that Grady was directly involved in at least three undercover purchases of crack cocaine by the informant. On September 14, 1994, the informant called Grady's residence and asked if she could "do five" rocks of crack cocaine. After Grady confirmed that she could, she gave the telephone to Merritt to arrange a meeting place and Merritt did, in fact, deliver five rocks of crack cocaine to the informant shortly thereafter. The informant paid Merritt $100 for 5 rocks of crack cocaine at $20.00 per rock. On October 13, 1994, the informant again called Grady, advised her that he wanted to get "fifteen," and told her that he had "300 beans." The informant testified that "300 beans" meant 300 dollars -15 rocks of crack cocaine at $20 each. Grady asked him when he wanted to get it and, upon being told that he wanted it "sometime tonight," she told him, "Well, let us know." In a second conversation, Grady assured the informant that she would wrap the crack in "brown wrapper or something" and Atwater later delivered crack cocaine to the informant. On December 8, 1994, the informant called Grady a third time to purchase crack cocaine and Merritt later delivered one $20 rock. In addition to these transactions, the informant set up several purchases directly with Harris and Merritt during 1994 and 1995, which originated from Grady's residence and were witnessed by law enforcement officials. An ensuing search warrant, executed at Grady's residence on August 30, 1995, uncovered the handwritten note addressed to Grady which evidenced an additional drug transaction between her and an unknown buyer.

Branch, 970 F.2d at 1371, n.3 (quoting McKeever, 169 F. Supp. at 430); see also United States v. Long, 651 F.2d 239, 242 (4th Cir. 1981). The factors provide guidance to the trial judge in ruling on an authentication question; however, proof of each factor is not required in every case. See Branch, 970 F.2d at 1371-72.

In reviewing a challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence, we ask "whether, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the government, any rational trier of facts could have found the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." United States v. Tresvant, 677 F.2d 1018, 1021 (4th Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original). We are satisfied that there was sufficient evidence to support each of Grady's convictions.

B.

Grady also challenges her sentence on three separate grounds. We address these contentions in turn.

Grady first urges that we vacate her sentence and remand her case for resentencing because the district court violated Fed. R. Crim. P 32(c)(3)(A) by neglecting to expressly inquire as to whether she had reviewed and discussed her presentence report with counsel.[6] Because this issue was not raised before the district court, we review it under the plain error standard. See United States v. Lockhart, 58 F.3d 86, 88 (4th Cir. 1995). "[B]efore vacating [Grady's] sentence, we must be convinced that (1) an error was committed; (2) the error was plain; and (3) the error affected Grady's substantial rights." Id. If so, "we must also decide whether the error is of a type that 'seriously affects the fairness, integrity or public reputation of judicial proceedings.'" Id. (quoting United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725, 732 (1993)). In the instant case, there is nothing in the record which affirmatively demonstrates that Grady read the presentence report and discussed it with her counsel before being sentenced. As a result, we are forced to conclude that the district court committed plain error. See Lockhart, 58 F.3d at 88-89. However, we must still determine whether the error affected the outcome of Grady's sentencing hearing, i.e. whether it was prejudicial. Id. at 88-89.

We note first that Grady does not contend that she did not read the report, or that she did not discuss its contents with her counsel prior to sentencing. Instead, she proceeds directly to the argument that she could have challenged the attribution of 30 grams of crack cocaine to her for sentencing purposes, contending that the distribution of this amount during the conspiracy was not foreseeable as to her. This argument is unavailing. Under the sentencing guidelines, a "defendant should be held accountable for the conduct of others that was both in furtherance of the conspiracy and reasonably foreseeable in connection with the conspiracy." United States v. D'Anjou, 16 F.3d 604, 614 (4th Cir. 1994). Thus, the amount that may be attributed to Grady is not limited to the amounts for which she personally took orders. See id. Grady's presentence report outlines, in detail, sixteen crack cocaine purchases that were made from the conspiracy group. Testimony at trial showed clearly that the vast majority of the purchases originated from Grady's house, which the evidence revealed to be the center of operations for the drug enterprise. As evidenced by the tape recordings, Grady was directly involved in at least three controlled drug buys, and in these three, two different runners were dispatched to deliver the drugs to the informant. Thus, the only reasonable inference from the evidence presented to the jury was that she was an active participant in the drug distribution conspiracy, and the jury so found.

[6] Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 32(c)(3)(A) requires the sentencing court to "verify that the defendant and defendant's counsel have read and discussed the presentence report."

Grady did not testify at trial, but did choose to address the district court judge at sentencing. She contended she was not involved with her two co-defendants and had been trying to get them to quit. She specifically denied to the district court judge participating in any drug-related calls for drugs:

THE COURT:	Are you saying that you didn't take any telephone calls dealing with somebody wanting to purchase drugs?
DEFENDANT GRADY:	Not as I know of.

J.A. 450. Grady can hardly be prejudiced by a lack of opportunity to present evidence showing only a limited criminal liability when she denied to the district court any criminal liability at all. Furthermore, any argument that a lack of foreseeability could be established by the fact that more sales were attributed to her than those with which she was personally involved would be without merit, as would be the argument that insignificant variations in sales amounts could be a basis for showing unforeseeability.

Grady's second allegation of prejudice is that she could have challenged a statement in the presentence report that she was the leader of the conspiracy, which she contends may have influenced the sentencing outcome. We find this contention to be equally meritless. Although the presentence report does characterize Grady as the "lead" person, it made no upward adjustment for her role in the offense. Furthermore, the district court, presented with an agreed upon guideline range of 78 to 97 months, sentenced Grady to 80 months imprisonment -- only two months over the minimum guideline sentence -and made no reference to a "lead" role to justify the sentence imposed.

Accordingly, Grady has failed to show that her sentencing would have been affected by challenges to the drug amounts attributed to her or to the characterization of her role in the conspiracy. We conclude that the technical Rule 32 violation did not affect her substantial rights, and we decline to vacate Grady's sentence.

Grady next contends that she is entitled to resentencing because the district court did not make a factual determination of the amount of drugs foreseeable to her. In the absence of a timely objection by the defendant, a district court need not conduct an independent factual inquiry and may adopt factual findings contained within the presentence report. See United States v. Gilliam, 987 F.2d 1009, 1013 (4th Cir. 1993). At sentencing, Grady's trial counsel agreed that the presentence report accurately reflected the applicable offense level and guideline range, and did not object to the district court's explicit adoption of the presentence report's factual findings and guideline application. Accordingly, the district court was not required to conduct an independent factual inquiry into the amount of drugs foreseeable to Grady and did not err in attributing to Grady the total quantity of crack sold by the members of the conspiracy.

Grady's final contention is that she received ineffective assistance of counsel because her trial counsel failed to object to the amount of drugs attributed to her at sentencing. Claims of ineffective assistance of counsel are generally not appropriate on direct appeal and should be raised in a motion pursuant to 28 U.S.C.A. § 2255 (West 1994), unless the record conclusively shows that counsel did not provide effective assistance. See United States v. King, 119 F.3d 290, 295 (4th Cir. 1997). Having carefully reviewed the record, we conclude that it does not conclusively show that counsel's representation fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. See generally Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 688, 80 L. Ed. 2d 674, 104 S. Ct. 2052 (1984). Accordingly, Grady's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel is not properly before this court and must be dismissed.

IV.

Defendant Harris raises an independent challenge to his conviction, contending that the district court erred in denying his motion for mistrial because Grady's counsel, in closing argument, implied that Grady would have testified against her son and co-defendant Harris had she testified at trial. Harris argues that the challenged comment by Grady's attorney "so infected the trial with unfairness as to make the resulting conviction a denial of due process." United States v. Francisco, 35 F.3d 116, 120 (4th Cir. 1994) (internal quotation marks omitted). We disagree. While the comment was improper, the district court immediately issued an appropriate curative instruction, warning the jury that arguments of counsel were not evidence and that the jury was not to speculate as to why Grady did not testify. We also reject Harris' contention that the comment drew attention to the fact that Harris did not testify. We find nothing in the comment which would support this interpretation and, in any event, the district court also instructed the jury that a defendant is not required to produce any evidence and that no inference whatsoever can be drawn from the fact that a defendant does not testify. Accordingly, the district court did not err in denying Harris' motion for a mistrial.

V.

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the convictions of Merritt, Grady, and Harris.
